Since I don't have access to a double boiler with which to melt oil and/or fat into beeswax to soften the wax and make it more suitable for eating without it getting stuck between my teeth, a cup of very hot water can be had for free from any teahouse or coffee shop with enough room to spare in its paper cup to melt less than a stick of beeswax into it.

Once sufficient wax is dissolved into the hot water, and while the water is still hot, stir into it something oily and fatty, such as a blend of olive oil or sunflower oil which is sold as “spreadable butter”. This product has (actually) been blended with dairy cream, not butter (but that’s close enough ;-).

Follow this by stirring in some honey.

By this time, the hot water will have cooled down enough to avoid burning your mouth and the wax should have sufficient oil mixed into it to soften the wax. Add more honey if this mixture is not tantalizing enough to tempt you to want to slurp it all up!

You may need a spoon to scoop off the waxy butter floating on top:

Enjoy!

And follow up with this research ...
