In my lifetime of some 60 years I have only seen two weird events. The first I explained prior and the second was a triangle shaped craft like SteveThackery described.

I was working on some electronic projects late one night and went outside for a break around midnight. Then I noticed some weird dull Indian red lights moving off in the distance. It kept moving towards me and flew right over my house. It had three red marker lights in a triangle and I could tell it was triangle shaped craft by the stars disappearing around the form as it moved. It caught my eye because we always see red, green marker lights and a white strobe but not on this aircraft. I say aircraft because it was a jet aircraft, probably military, and the noise from the jet engines was obvious.

This does not fall within the realm of an unidentified flying object imo because it can be identified by the fact is has a conventional jet engine. While the craft I described prior made no sound, had no marker lights of any kind and moved through a distance of about 100km in one second making a sweeping 90 degree turn vertical in the process.

It was a turning point for me because at this point I realized whatever I thought was understood was no longer relevant. Not a big deal, 80% of people believe an omniscient being created the whole universe from nothing in a matter of days so my supposed misunderstanding is quite minor in comparison. Just a craft doing something I cannot explain, nothing more nothing less.

If we understood the similarities and the differences between “spaceship Earth” and UFO’s, we’d understand a lot.

It helps to assume that an intelligent being created this universe with efficiency uppermost along with all other considerations. That said, why make a planet solid when you can save on the expense of moving it around in orbit about a star if it were hollow like the stem of mint saves on mass by possessing internal structural support surrounding its hollow core.

But structure doesn’t have to merely be geometrical (like the frame of a house or a spacecraft). Structure can also be forces resulting from their byproduct of function similar to our expertise of paving roads to make our use of the wheel more efficient.

We also don’t give ourselves enough credit for being the penultimate pinnacle of evolutionary development. Not even the angels in heaven are as gifted as we are despite our proximity to God blinds us (more often than not) to our proximity. We are merely one step away from God realization since we live in a world of duality while God is unity and the angels are more complicated than our dualistic selves and, thus, are without any internal nor interactive conflicts since any higher prime-numbered logic from our own (greater than the prime number of two) is never even-numbered. So, they have no trouble with their faith while ours is constantly undermined by the oppositional consequences of duality.
